The chloroplast is believed to be surrounded by four membranes including an inner envelope membrane, a thylakoid membrane, an external envelope membrane, and a plasma membrane. Since some chloroplast proteins are known to be encoded in the DNA of the nuclear genome, it is important to be able to isolate the corresponding RNA from chloroplast, as well as the DNA. We developed a modification of the classical endonuclease digestion procedure to enable us to selectively isolate RNA. Chloroplast inner envelope membranes were isolated from spinach chloroplasts by differential centrifugation. Inner envelope membranes were obtained in 12% yield, and the enrichment of the proteins was approximately 60-fold. This procedure was then applied to total RNA to selectively isolate RNA coding for the proteins of the inner envelope membranes in a 28% yield. From the chloroplasts, we isolated 50 micrograms of RNA per gram of cell and 85% of the total RNA can be recovered, whereas after endonuclease digestion, the recovery of RNA was only 15%. A large amount of RNA is necessary for cDNA synthesis and, hence, for subsequent functional analyses such as gene expression analysis. In addition to isolating RNA, the endonuclease digestion procedure can be used for preparation of probes for the isolation of cDNA clones of the chloroplast gene./* * Copyright (c) 2015, 2018, Oracle and/or its affiliates 04aeff104c
