Emissions controls on fossil fuels are almost at the point where pollution from these fuels no longer yields any significant improvement in the economy. Efficiency gains can be expected to be very small for many years to come. We are approaching a point where the negative impacts of emitting greenhouse gases will outweigh the benefits. To what extent we can engineer controls to cut emissions in the future depends, as usual, on where we are economically and politically. There are a number of possible scenarios: no changes are made the world becomes a little better there are some major changes There is no doubt that the latest IPCC report confirms what we all know already. Even if we carry on emitting as before, the climate will continue to change and the chance of us being able to adapt to the changes will diminish. The IPCC report lays out a range of options but no further action is considered likely in any of them. Methane may have a further role. By some estimates methane is a more powerful greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide. It is produced by a number of processes and some of it is released by decomposition of organisms living in the sea or in the land. The IPCC has reviewed the evidence and stated: "Considering that the magnitude of methane emissions from marine and terrestrial sources is relatively uncertain, and that most of the uncertainty is associated with the fluxes from wetlands, the overall impact of methane on global warming remains uncertain" It appears that, because of the uncertainty, methane should not be counted as a part of the total. The jury is out on this one. The world is producing almost twice as much methane as is released. It is produced in a number of ways and the IPCC review is summarised by this comment: "Because of the large uncertainties in the emission estimates and the availability of estimates for
