Sometimes, when you're starting to create your own game, you're not really sure what's the point you're trying to make with your art. If you've started working on a super fancy, yet pretty-looking game, and yet you feel that it lacks character, well, you've come to the right place. I'm talking about what game design books or articles call "story in games." From a design perspective, story in games includes three components: character, gameplay, and world. Character The character can be anything from the hero to the villain, and it's the role that the game is centered around. This role is, generally, determined by the environment of the game, the story it tells, and the character's personality. It's hard to say that one role is more important than the other, and you can use all of them in your games. Example: Mario vs Luigi In Mario vs Luigi, the two characters are Nintendo's most famous character. The gameplay revolves around Mario rescuing his sister. The purpose of the story is to help Mario save his sister, and the environment is the Peach's castle, which is a big royal and colorful place. Gameplay Here is where the gameplay comes in. It's where your game is lived. It's where all the action takes place. It's where the game gets started. Most games are comprised of multiple levels. Each level has a different purpose. You can build your levels in the following ways. - Linear - Staggered - Cycle - Spiral - Deathmatch - Endless - Perfect world - Permadeath The good news is that you don't have to stick to any of these structures. You can create your own levels. Example: Battletoads A good example of a linear game structure is Battletoads. It consists of 3 levels. The first level is where the enemies are located, the second is where
