The larynx is a critical organ for speech production and its removal is associated with serious voice disorders. This study proposes a surgical device that is designed to improve the oropharyngeal exposure and thereby enhance voice recovery after laryngectomy. This device consists of a percutaneous expander and a silicon catheter with a stent to support the tongue. To assess the surgical applicability of the device, nine dogs underwent laryngectomy with the device. The expander was successfully placed under fluoroscopic guidance. A tongue stent was maintained in the canine oropharynx to prevent the prolapse of the epiglottis. Clinical follow-up showed that the device did not cause major complications. After 6 weeks of the implantation, the tongue stent was easily removed without recurrence of perforation of the epiglottis. Nine weeks after implantation, voice quality significantly improved and phonation was enhanced. Histological examination showed that the implanted stent did not cause erosion or other structural abnormalities of the mucosa. The device was found to be safe and effective for improving the oropharyngeal exposure.This research project will utilize two behavioral procedures, inhibition of return (IOR) and affective priming, to examine the psychobiological underpinnings of depressed mood.
