On a personal note, I'd love to see pen pressure and pressure sensitivity become available in Adobe's drawing tools. It's a little part of me that gets pumped when I see screenwriting software like Final Draft or Screenwriting Pro available to touch and select with the Apple Pencil. If you're interested in taking a look at Adobe Photoshop , you should check this out. I've been working with it for about a month now and it's fast, stable, and a pretty great tool. I also feel like it's a little bit of a dark horse because it's Apple making it and it's still an Android app, but I think it has potential. Creating a new document is now faster and easier with the updated Photoshop file manager. You can now navigate your creative library with the new sidebar. It also has full support for Artboards, which allow you to create a template that can then be applied to multiple documents as a single object. You can also use Smart Objects for images with transparency. ABSOLUTELY ADORABLE: You can see the Smart Object as displayed on the Apple iPad Pro. Note that similar effects can be incorporated into other files and exported as Smart Object via the Merge Function. GOOD: The iPad Pro's Pencil is welcome support for Adobe CS6. You can now share your workflow with AppStories, whether that be your PSDs, variations or assets in use. You can edit their story on the go and then publish it when done. Previewing changes can be done in real-time. Once you're happy with the story, share your work with followers. You can also see what you were working on or get back insights and new ideas.
