OK, one more question to make your life easier: How do I get rid of all the auto-calculated white balance and straighten out my photos? I tried to follow the instructions on the Long Exposure stills NR help page since it is built into Elements 11. I tried using auto exposure and auto white balance to apply the auto levels, auto straightening, and auto noise reduction, but the auto levels were off, so I chose custom made levels. I am happy with the results on the white balance and straightening, but I dislike the effect of the auto noise reduction that makes the bokeh look too straight. This tool is the difference between standard and outstanding. As soon as I saw it I thought: so that's what Adobe has been working on for years. It's so intuitive and it just works. Wow! I can't see how I could use anything else after this when I work out of the box.

3. On multiple monitor, the desktop is split into two panes, side by side. The top pane is moved to show a calendar view of whatever date it is; the bottom is set to the photos you'm working on. This one is amazing. I just opened a new workspace with hundreds of photos (actually more than 1,000). I sorted into folders (yes I'm a purist). Yep, Photoshop immediately geotagged my images. While countless programs will do this, the process can be distracting and it often is not that accurate.

Edit the geotag and export the file. Nothing more to add.
